My Faithometer

Faith is something we all possess. Whether we claim to have faith in God, faith in our spouse or another person, or simply faith that we will still have our jobs or a family member with us in the morning, it is still faith, a belief in someone or something. Do we possess the same amount of faith in each of these equally? How do we measure this faith? By our actions or a feeling, or even by comparison to someone else's faith?

If you could visually see your faith through a meter, a "faithometer" of sorts, what effect do you think it would have on the quantity and/or quality of your faith? Would you be disappointed in the amount of faith you actually have in something or someone? Do you think your faithometer would measure a higher quality of faith in some things over others? If so, how would you respond to find out you have less faith in God than you have in your job or something else? Is your faith in God your benchmark to all the other faiths in your life? Or is that faith lower on your faithometer scale?

Christ placed His faith in His Father, the benchmark on the ultimate faithometer scale. Christ had faith in God's plan, but beyond that, Christ had faith in mankind to carry out God's plan in the church. It was Christ's faith in man that led Him to the cross. Since Christ was faithful to mankind, it follows that we, mankind, should be full of faith to God, our faithometer should read FULL.

Does your faithometer still read FULL when you feel your prayers have not been heard or answered how you thought they should be or when you don't understand what God is doing in a particular situation or in your life? When you can fervently pray, "Let thy will be done," and you wholeheartedly turn your life to Christ, having faith that your Father in Heaven will do what is best for you, I believe your meter will peg on FULL.

And without faith it is impossible to please God, because anyone who comes to him must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who earnestly seek him. Hebrews 11:6
