Boulevard of Broken Dreams

As a kid, I traveled though the upper Midwest quite a bit. There were farm houses every section or two dotting the landscape. As I grew older, more and more of these houses were abandoned. Several years ago, we traveled those same roads, and almost all the houses were just skeletons along the road, long left empty by the families who gave them life. As I travel through rural Oklahoma around our vicinity, towns like Dustin, Hanna, and Pharoah, I see the empty buildings where businesses once thrived, the remains of schools where children once played, and the empty churches where God was once worshipped. Empty and forlorn, only the sound of wind where voices and laughter once lived.

As I pass by, my mind replaces the emptiness with what once was. I see the empty house on the day it was built, and a happy family set foot inside for the first time with dreams of the future blossoming in their minds. The stores, painted and new with entrepreneurs dreaming of making a fine living from their products and services. The schools with laughing and playing children outside and teachers waiting to impart knowledge to a new generation. The new church building where proud parishioners had a dedication service and big dinner to celebrate their accomplishment.

But those dreams all came to an end. Whether the economy, weather, location, or big business, they were destroyed, one by one, until they vanished away. Now, as we travel down those boulevards of broken dreams, only a faint memory remains of what once was. I share this not to depress you, but to impress upon all of us the futility of this life.

Do not put your trust in the things of this world or the people of this world. Put your trust in God alone. Dream your dreams in this life, but let your big dreams be about the life to come. Christ tells us to put our trust in things not of this world where moth and rust does not destroy, where thieves do not break in and steal, to store our treasure in heaven.

No one built a house thinking about the day it will be torn down, or a business thinking about the day it will close for good, or a church thinking about the day no one would worship in it. But, as sure as there is a beginning, there is an end. The spiritual house we are building, however, is eternal. It will never be torn down, it will never be empty, it will not be a boulevard of broken dreams, it will be a street of gold forever shining.
