Restoration

We have been studying the restoration movement in America beginning with the second great awakening. Specifically, the Stone Campbell movement from which emerged the Church of Christ, the Disciples of Christ, and the First Christian assemblies of today. Why is this important to us?

First, it gives us an account of the mentality behind the movement. Men who gave up many things to pursue the truth of God's word. They were men who struggled against tradition and up-bringing, trying to use the simplicity of the gospel to forge a unity based on truth. They were not perfect, they were not always successful, but they were resolute in their pursuit to produce a truly non-denominational body.

Second, it shows the historical background which prevailed at the time and influenced the pursuit of unity. The issue of slavery, the divisiveness of the civil war, and the aftermath of the bloodiest conflict in the history of the United States. It reveals the basis of division within the body that exists and widens in our present time.

Thirdly, it is necessary to us as we review our present state of doctrine. The basis for our interpretation (hermeneutic) of the scripture. Are we correct, or have we become entrenched in the very traditional quagmire that leaders of the restoration were so eager to break free from? Is unity possible, or is the prayer of Christ that we would "all be one," unattainable? We all read the same bible, we all pray to the same God, division is not God's idea, it is man's failure. Restoration history teaches us how men fought over tradition, creeds, synods and interpretation of scripture, to reach conclusions modern religion is based on.

Lastly, it explains why there are thousands of denominations in the world. Why there is essentially a church building on every street corner, and, in a broader sense, why people who all profess to be Christians are so divided.

In conclusion, it helps us to find our own faith. Hopefully, it gives us the desire to emulate men who based their faith and doctrine on God's word., to hold up for examination what we believe has been revealed in God's unchanging word.
